Houston Center for Contemporary Craft
4848 Main Street, Houston, TX 77002

(HOUSTON, TX) September 6, 2019 – Houston Center for Contemporary Craft (HCCC) and KINETIC present a one-night concert inspired by the solo exhibition, Nathalie Miebach: The Water Line, featuring work by the contemporary basket weaver and sculptor that focuses on the major hurricanes of 2017: Harvey, Irma, and Maria. Fascinated by two narratives generated by every disaster--one based on science, encompassing temperature, wind and pressure gradients, and one based on human experience--Miebach translates information from these storms into graphic music scores, large-scale woven installations, and sculptures. As part of the artist's Weather Score Project, The Water Line Concert will feature two new compositions, inspired by Hurricane Harvey, by Houston composers Shane Monds and Kyle Rivera, as well as existing compositions by Matthew Jackfert and Harrison Ponce, based on other hurricanes. Miebach will be present to speak about her work in the exhibition and her collaborations with various composers.

Since 2009, Miebach has collaborated with composers and musicians in her Weather Score Project to translate her graphic scores, based on weather data, into musical compositions, so that her works also can be experienced through sound. Miebach says that she collaborates with composers for two reasons: to convey nuances and the emotion surrounding her research that is hard to perceive on a visual level and to reveal patterns or stories in the data that musicians may identify.

Miebach's approach to data visualization pushes the means by which scientific data is commonly represented and demonstrates the beneficial marriage of art and science. In her graphic score, Harvey Twitter SOS (2018), she depicts the effects of Hurricane Harvey on Houston, Texas, by using color and geometric shapes to tell the traumatic narrative of the hurricane, layering precipitation and wind data with responses from individuals who turned to Twitter for help when the emergency response system became overloaded. In the new compositions performed in The Water Line Concert, Monds and Rivera will interpret the Hurricane Harvey data used by Miebach, while drawing on their personal experiences.

About Nathalie Miebach

Based in Boston, Massachusetts, Nathalie Miebach is a sculptor who translates the scientific data of ecology, climate change, and meteorology into musical scores, sculptures, and large-scale installations. Miebach holds an MFA in sculpture and an MS in art education from the Massachusetts College of Arts in Boston. She has exhibited in North America, Europe, and Australia, and her work can be found in the collections of the Denison Museum of Art, the DeCordova Sculpture Museum, the Spencer Art Museum, Crystal Bridges Museum of American Art, and Facebook, among many others.
